Higher Species Numbers

Redlist Revival will provide a publicly accessible Quantifying Success Survey to identify the highest densities of species and in a format that enables all sites to be measured using standardised data against national, regional and county standards. By identifying these sites it will be possible to quantify how the best wildlife success is being achieved. With up to £500 million of public money together with a vast amount of private investment being spent on wildlife every year, it is imperative to revive species as effectively as possible.

Broader Area Delivering Species

Redlist Revival will provide a bench-marking system for sites to show wildlife potential. There are millions of acres that are helping to provide for red-listed species but have no idea what they are achieving or indeed could achieve. These sites will have access to information to help focus their efforts. There are also many sites that believe that wildlife declines are not associated with their area. These sites will have access to information to encourage their involvement in the restoration process.

Better Information for Success

Redlist Revival will provide a working library of facts associated with the highest densities of red-listed species. This information needs to reach policy makers, existing and future site managers and also those contributing to and/or interested in conservation. For most species, each year gives a chance of success. Since the Earth Summit in 1992 there have been over twenty chances. Redlist Revival intends so much more to be achieved with the next twenty chances.
